Message from the President

At this juncture of your life, it is time to make sure that you make the right decision. Is a career in finance and accounting suitable for you?

Usually student considers Accountancy boring. However, today's accountancy has a lot to offers. Firms no longer have large manual ledgers but accountant of today fulfill the role of a business advisor, and must provide an added value service. As a result of increasing market expectations the industry is thus demanding high quality graduates that are looking for a challenging and rewarding career. The accountancy graduates once through with the course work and the work experience criteria, usually lead the organization in three to four years.

The aspiring students should have a strong desire to continue studying for at least 7 years after school. Trainees will spend most of their time away from their office and visit a wide variety of clients where they will be expected to deal personally with the clients as a part of their practical training. Combining this with a demanding exam structure means accountancy is not for people who are not willing to travel and work hard.

Assess your potential to be an accountant. You should be good at number crunching to pass exams. You should be a team member, adaptable, tactful, organised, honest and presentable. Training to be a professional Accountant is not easy and requires a firm commitment from the individual. Accountancy now is primarily a "social business" where it is essential to have an outgoing personality and good communication skills with both clients and colleagues.

Firms offer practical experience on a wide variety of clients that provides the right environment for swift advancement. Many firms offer the opportunity for secondments to their international operations that means a wide international exposure. The professional accountancy qualification holds worldwide recognition and continues to open many doors in the job market.

This great variety of experience helps the trainee to develop different talents and the broadest possible commercial awareness and understanding of all aspects of business matters relating to clients from very small concerns to public companies. Not only does this stretch the trainee but it also gives them an opportunity to decide where their interests lie.

Make the right choice for your career, as it will take place now or never.

Finally, for those with the perseverance and professional work ethic, accountancy offers a career with a rewarding future.

Shehzad Chamdia,
Fellow Chartered Accountant (FCA)
